WHILE the language of a country expresses the soul and higher emotions of a people, distinctive pastimes embody its physical vitality and culture. They are complementary and equally cherished inheritances which no nation that desires to preserve its racial identity and historic evolution will willingly surrender.

Ireland has been singularly endowed in both spheres. Her intellectual and athletic traditions are priceless inspiring possessions. The task of fostering the characteristic games that have kept Irish manhood strong and healthy and which imparted joyousness to life was undertaken by the Gaelic Athletic Association at a time when the existence and character of the games were in danger from external hostility and internal abuses. How successfully it has carried on its work the event and the musterings in the National Stadium attest.

The distinctive pastimes it promotes are more popular and the urge to excel in them is stronger than ever. The inherent merits of native games, apart from their association with our people throughout the ages, render them worthy of the highest esteem and best endeavours. Proficiency in either of our distinctive pastimes is an accomplishment of which every young Irishman can be justly proud. As games, they have evoked the praises of the most eminent educational and athletic authorities and the arenas in which they are played have become invaluable training grounds for a vigorous and disciplined race.

The athletic advantages and possibilities of the pastimes afford congenial scope for the highest activities of all with whom racial inheritances comes first in natural affection. The pursuit of native games repays tenfold in health and pleasure the attention devoted to them and their value is enhanced by the exalting influence of the national atmosphere by which they are surrounded. When we come to them with a full conception of their mission we feel we are hailing in the champions of each year the heirs and peers of the great exponents of the past—from the heroic eras of our island story. Herein our native games stand on a plane alone: rich in the glamour of chivalry and romance, in memories of thrilling hours and confident of a future as fruitful and inspiring.

The Gaelic Athletic Association

WHEN this senior final has been won, the victors can claim the distinction of being the fiftieth football champions of All-Ireland. That alone would render the occasion memorable; and when you glance down the roll of champions overleaf, you will appreciate the honour attached to triumph in this arena. You will see there the names of teams which aroused the country from end to end and will recall players whose prowess is still a theme of praise and a standard of excellence.

The grace and skill which they brought to past struggles for supremacy have been potent factors in preserving the merits of the games and in creating the popularity which has been mounting in recent years and will probably reach a fresh climax here to-day. In one year or another every province has been represented in the All-Ireland Hurling or Football Finals, and success in the latter has now gone to each in turn. These rivals have always been eager to win and equally ready to admit superiority. In this way the integrity and racial unity of Ireland are maintained under the aegis of the Association founded in Thurles almost exactly fifty-three years ago.

Those years have been marked by fateful, tragic and heroic events in our national history. They brought stress and anxiety to the Gaelic Athletic Association likewise; for its roots are in the heart of the people and its fortunes are indissolubly linked with theirs. Throughout all, the rank and file of the movement have remained steadfast to national ideals and aims and have sacrificed for their attainment. The Association has thriven on this devotion until it is now the greatest popular organisation with national cultural objectives in the country.

Three weeks ago was witnessed the greatest hosting ever assembled for a Gaelic contest. That was a demonstration of fealty to and admiration for native games. It was a heartening manifestation of the Gaelic spirit and strength of devotion which prevails towards native culture in general and the national ideal of Pearse in particular.

There is room and need to spread that spirit and to strive for that ideal. Both can be advanced by discipline and the recognition of national duties and rights. Champions rise and pass out; but the thread of vital national existence which the Founders of the Gaelic Athletic Association took up remains unbroken and coming generations should find native games still unsurpassed in the realm of sport and still infused with the essence of race-conscious pride. In that way they will live and bring strength and joy to the nation as a whole.
