1930 was for Tipperary hurlers a memorable year; in that year they won the Senior, Junior and Minor All-Ireland Hurling Titles. To-day, Kerry men have hopes of winning two All-Ireland Finals in Minor and Senior Football and on October 3rd, when they play the London Juniors, Kerry footballers have hopes of winning the Junior All-Ireland title. But the men of Meath of London and of Dublin feel that the Tipperary record will not be equalled in 1954.

1900—The creation of Provincial Councils of the Gaelic Athletic Association was approved by Congress.

As has been proved conclusively, the parish is the ideal foundation on which to build a national organisation, and the parish will be the vital unit in the organisation that will raise up the new Gaelic Ireland. If we could put before the parishes of rural Ireland the grand ideal of a Gaelic Ireland, we would have provided for our rural communities a stimulus that would quickly dissipate their present apathy; we would have given them a task that would satisfy many of the cravings that at present lead them away to the town, to the city, to the emigrant ship.

The Gaelic ideal to me means a free Irish nation, and loving our own magnificent language, fostering and perfecting our own splendid games, reviving our grand music and songs and dances, studying our wonderful history, reviving the best of our innumerable customs, perfecting that Christian way of life that once made Ireland the light of Western Europe. If we could build up such a nation, strong and proud and courageous, we could with benefit take in from the outside world all the good that it has to offer, without fear of being submerged in the process as is happening to-day.

The Ballad of the Fourth Green Field

One morning near Black Valley on the Kerry hills I strode,
I heard a woman moaning in a holding by the road.
She was old but queenly beautiful, with grief her brow was sealed
As she made her lamentation for her Fourth Green Field.

I stayed my step beside her, and then to her says I,
"O are you Helen fair of Troy, descended from the sky?"
"My name is Cáit Ní Houlihan," the woman's voice appealed.
Then I knew her for the owner of the Fourth Green Field.

I said: "Your western field is bright, the grass is sweet though rare;
Your eastern field is emerald green, a plain beyond compare;
Your southern field is ringed with hills, and rich in plenteous yield,"
"Mavrone!" she cried, "My sorrow on my Fourth Green Field!"

"The stranger came one day," she said, "he thought me all alone,
My eldest son he drew the sword, his name it was Wolfe Tone;
The grief I suffered as he fell has never fully healed
For his blood bedewed the grasses of my Fourth Green Field."

"'Twas there my bravest sons were born," she cried her plaint aloud,
"A red lad called O'Donnell, and Art and Shamus the Proud,
And Henry Joy McCracken and darling Hugh O'Neill;
How can I bear the loss of you, my Fourth Green Field?"

"When I was young," the woman said, "I had lovers by my side;
I had P. H. Pearse and Connolly, and Major John MacBride,
I had Clarke and brave MacDonagh, and more who'd never yield,
If they had lived they'd gain for me, my Fourth Green Field."

I looked across the Kerry hills, through air like morning wine.
I looked upon the woman then whose spirit kindled mine:
"There are lads in Ireland yet," I said, "who'll don for you the shield,
Before the face of God they'll win your Fourth Green Field."

I stumbled down the mountain road and sought the plain below;
High on the hills the caoine hung and tossed in grief and woe.
I cannot rest nor can I sleep, with grief my brow is sealed
Since I met the woman moaning for her Fourth Green Field.

Paud O'Donoghue

—PATRICK ARCHER

The Yeos were in Dunshaughlin and the Hessians in Dunreagh
And spread thro' fair Moynalty were the Fencibles of Reagh
While Roden's bloody Hunters ranged from Screen to Mullachoo
When hammered were the pike-heads first by Paud O'Donoghue

Bold Pádraig was as strong a boy as ever hammer swung
And the finest hurler that you'd find the lads of Meath among,
And when the wrestling match was o'er no man could boast he threw
The dark-haired smith of Curragha, young Paud O'Donoghue.

But Ninety-Eight's dark season came and Irish hearts were sore,
The pitch-cap and triangle the patient folk outwore
The Blacksmith thought of Ireland and found he'd work to do
"I'll forge some steel for freedom," said Paud O'Donoghue.

Bold Pádraig fought at Tara—you know the nation's tale;
Tho' borne down in that struggle, not hopeless is the Gael,
For still in Meath's fair County there are brave lads not a few
Who would follow in the footsteps of bold Paud O'Donoghue.

The Valley of Knockanure

(Traditional Ballad adapted by Bryan McMahon)

You may sing and speak about Easter Week or the heroes of Ninety-Eight
Of the Fenian Men who roamed the glen in victory or defeat
Their names are placed on history's page, their memory will endure
Not a song is sung for our darling sons in the Valley of Knockanure.

Our hero boys they were bold and true, no counsel would they take
They rambled to a lonely spot where the Black and Tans did wait
The Republic bold they did uphold though outlawed on the moor
And side by side they bravely died in the Valley of Knockanure.

There was Walsh and Lyons and Dalton, boys, they were young and in their pride
In every house, in every town, they were always side by side
No more they'll feel the soft wind steal o'er uplands fair and sure
For side by side our heroes died in the Valley of Knockanure.

Oh ! Walsh and Lyons and Dalton brave although your hearts are clay
Yet in your stead we have true men yet to guard the gap to-day
While grass is found on Ireland's ground your memory will endure
So God guard and keep the place you sleep and the Valley of Knockanure.

Through the courtesy of Mr. Denis Guiney, Managing Director, the trophies for to-day's Finals have been displayed in the windows of Messrs. Clery & Co. (1941) Ltd., O'Connell Street, Dublin.

TO-DAY'S INTERLUDE

The pageant of "The Four Green Fields" by Bryan McMahon, which is being presented at half-time of the Senior game, depicts Mother Ireland calling her sons to her from the four Provinces. As a foretaste of what the pageant contains we print here the introductory lines of The Herald.

A Cárde is a Com-Šaeveala
I speak for One Ireland—Ireland One,
North, South, East, West,
Leinster, Munster, Connacht, Ulster.
The Hills and Valleys of her,
Her moorlands, her highlands, her rich lowlands,
One Ireland—Ireland One
Éire san roinn.

This day of days
From each of my four green fields
I will call my sons to my side
One Ireland—Ireland One
Éire san roinn.

JOHN HALLIDAY & SON LIMITED, DUNDALK

SAM MAGUIRE

SAM MAGUIRE was born of Protestant parents in the town of Dunmanway, Co. Cork. Both his father and mother were strong Nationalists, and from an early age he showed that he was following in their footsteps. There is a tradition in Dunmanway that his ancestors arrived in that area with the armies of the O'Neills and O'Donnells, having travelled with them from Fermanagh to the Battle of Kinsale.

Young Sam Maguire joined the Civil Service in London. An outstanding footballer, he was captain of the Hibernians and of the London-Irish teams that contested the All-Ireland Finals of 1900, 1901 and 1902. He usually played at centre-field.

He joined the National Movement and took such a prominent part that he became O/C of Britain. He was fearless and outspoken, and proved his words with deeds. On several occasions he supplied arms to Ireland and was a very close associate of Michael Collins. His activities were such that he was finally dismissed from the British Civil Service. He spent two terms in jail.

In failing health he retired to his native Dunmanway in 1924 where he died shortly afterwards. The local G.A.A. Park is dedicated to his memory. He is buried in the Protestant churchyard in that town, where a monument to commemorate him was erected by his friends and associates. They purchased the Sam Maguire Cup and presented it to the G.A.A. as a trophy for the All-Ireland Football Champions to perpetuate the memory of a great G.A.A. man and a great patriot.

"The mighty spirit of Tolstoi was not more refreshed by his first sight of the mountains after his journey over the vast plains of Russia than is the soul of a true-born hurler at the sight of a good hurling match. When I reflect on the sublime simplicity of the game, the strength and swiftness of the players their apparently angelic impetuosity, the apparent recklessness of life and limb, their magic skill, their marvellous escapes, and the overwhelming pleasure they give their friends, I have no hesitation in saying that the game of hurling is in the front rank of the Fine Arts."—MICHAEL CUSACK.
